google drive howÂ .There's a new update to Sonic Arts Collection. The theme of the Sonic Arts collection is game-related art from yesteryear, which includes some great Sonic, Spyro, and Phantasy Star artwork. It's a little disappointing that most of the work in this compilation is from licensed games; I wanted to see some original, original art. Thankfully, there are a few original pieces to be had here. In any case, a few of the artists who contributed to the collection have let their work loose, and shared it with the community. All these artists deserve your support and enjoyment. In particular, I'm particularly fond of these three pieces. The first one is this beautiful piece by John Ruggieri:Implicit learning of higher-order semantic relationships. Language is a complex system that provides humans with ways to encode and represent information. Understanding the structure of the language that we use to describe our world is crucial for interacting with it effectively. This article reports on work demonstrating implicit learning of higher-order semantic relationships, such as size-frequency and number-amount relationships. In this set of experiments, participants were more likely to use a dimension as a dimension of another dimension to encode the target concept. This study extends the scope of the cognitive processes at play in conceptual encoding by demonstrating that higher-order relationships may become automatically encoded and used to code for target concepts, thus supporting the theory of the "latent semantic analysis" (LSA) approach to encoding.Friday, April

01, 2009 Why isn't there a monopoly on Chrome? I'm a bit disillusioned today. I've written software for Firefox and Internet Explorer for over a decade. I'm a dyed-in-the-wool Firefoxie, I run it every day of the week and all day long. Why am I not a happy camper? Because Chrome doesn't work correctly on my computer. Apparently, it's a known bug in the native Windows version of Chrome. (Chrome/Win 7 Beta) It's not that I can't work around it, it's that the native browser is unusable on my computer 6d1f23a050
