It means that you have to keep on saving your progress each time you enter a new city. In order to avoid that, you should make sure the city is properly named and entered during the first save. The final debug toolbar automatically closes when the game is launched.

U.S. President Donald Trump has had enough. The response to a far-left protest in Charlottesville, Va., -- where neo-Nazis and white supremacists gathered in a bid to protest against a statue of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee -- was blamed entirely on Trump. Under pressure from the left, and a media obsessed with his perceived lack of "decorum" and "civility," the president went to Charlottesville, where he disavowed the white nationalists and neo-Nazis -- perhaps convincingly -- but the press pounced on it.

Advertisement: It didn't help that Trump's initial response to the white nationalists was limited to a tweetstorm that failed to mention the "Unite the Right" rally at all. Meanwhile, this angry response by Trump has only stoked the flames of the far-left and radicalized it. "He's obsessed with the idea of being a civil president in spite of everything that he's seen from the left," said GOP strategist Paul Miller. "His instinct is to retreat and surrender and, of course, that's the wrong instinct to have."

Advertisement: Trump's critics said he left out a moral lesson. The anti-war left is clear about its beliefs and they are no secret to anyone who follows the news. "I thought he was speaking to us," said retired Army Lt. Col. Nathan White, a vocal Trump supporter. "It seemed almost a moral or personal message." White is referring to Trump's speech in which he condemned far-left groups and their free speech and right to protest in the exact same manner as the white nationalist protesters.

Advertisement: After Charlottesville, many Republicans appeared to be eager to turn the page and move on. They wanted to clear the air and put the matter to rest. "It's time to move forward. Let's end this, let's have a country that's safe, let's have a country that's dignified," Trump told reporters in the wake of the violence.
